Police say poorly maintained vehicles and altered exhausts are an ongoing problem that impacts residents, particularly those whose homes back onto increasingly wider and busier roads.

“We’ve had complaints from the community,” said Peel Sgt. Steve Arney. “(The noise) frustrates people.”

He said the fine is $110.

Arney said there are two culprits: vehicles that are not maintained and mufflers on cars and motorcycles that have been modified to make excessive noise.

“They sound like they’re going 100 km/h when they’re not,” Arney said of the modified vehicles.

The noise distracts other drivers and interferes with residents enjoying their property, according to police.

The goals of the campaign are to take a “zero tolerance” approach to enforcement, and to reduce the number of vehicles that don’t comply with the Highway Traffic Act’s “unnecessary noise” regulation.
